

WORKING PAPER

025
21 September 1966

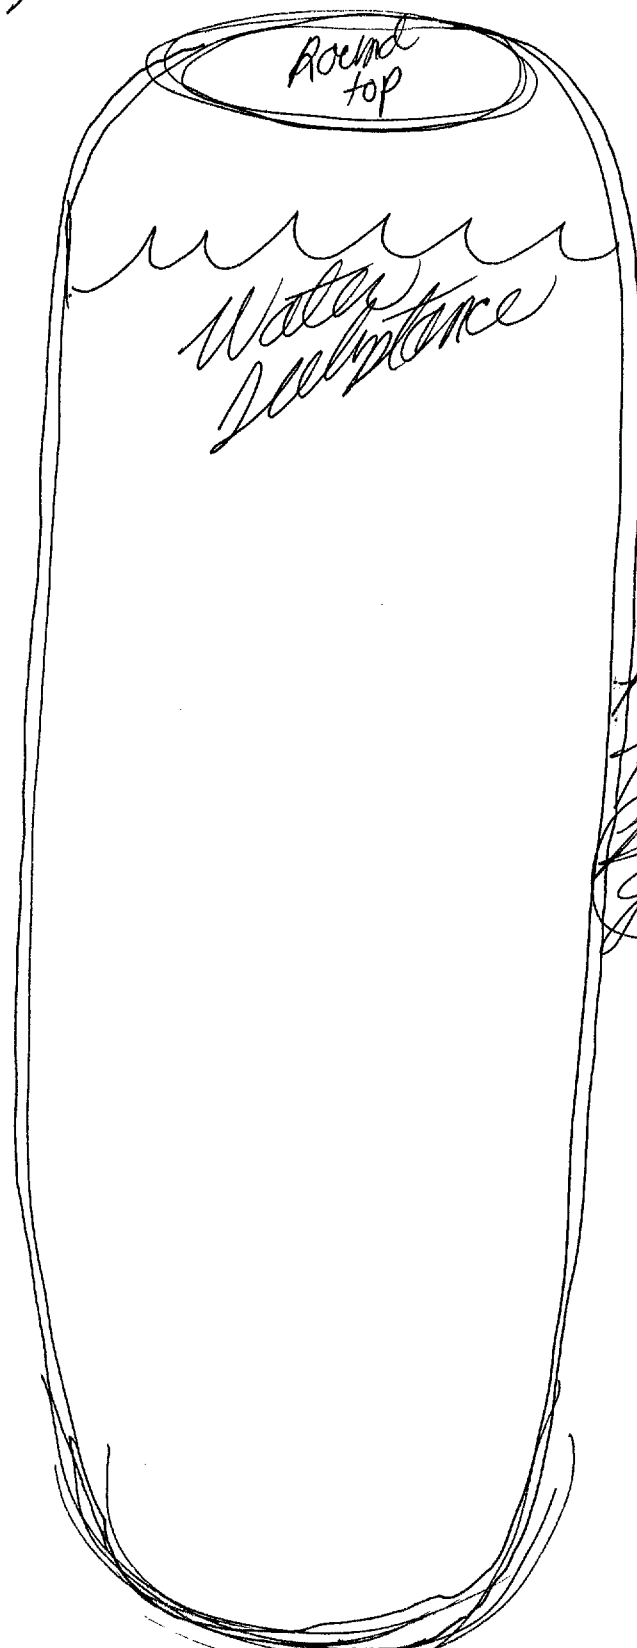

Summary

A handful of people in the building are a think tank. The small group of people are working to complete or finalize a government project involving human resources. They are working directly on or with another person or other people (cases) under experimental conditions. It is a type of lab. The team is serious and each is specialized for various contributing factors. Developmental procedures is the focus. They are doing testing (research) for training purposes (of government personnel and future outcomes). Although this project is controlled, it is unethical according to American standards and clinical psychology. One of the members on the team is an older man and a scientist. He is wearing a white lab coat with brown pants. This scientist insures that activities are technically performed properly. He pays close attention to the scientific aspects (monitors) while other people on the team perform other functions. Something is hooked up on machine, possibly a person, that has red round finger buttons that are pushed. A cinder block wall is at the end of a hallway.
